Once filled in by the child (with support), this table could be kept somewhere in view, so that the child is reminded of what they may be feeling at a certain time, and what (if anything) they should do about it. For example, when the child begins to get hot, they can look at the timetable (they may need prompting to do this at first), and will be reminded to take some deep breaths, or some time out. This could also be simplified, if for example, the child particularly struggles with anxiety (worry), then they could carry around a card with the signs that they are feeling anxious, and strategies to relax. This can be used by the child as a reminder, but also to show the teacher (without having to express it verbally, which may be difficult) how they are feeling, and why they have got out their stress ball, or are needing some time out. This then gives the child a level of independence in dealing with their emotions.
